San Martin and Mazamitla, Mexico: Self Management and New Low Income Eco-Housing

For some 8 years Future Without Poverty has worked with San Martin to make this small settlement more livable. Initially, a gasoline generator from Texas was installed to supply two light bulbs per 10 houses. Later three solar panels were installed to substitute for the generator. Now they use them both. A TV antenna indicates that someone now watches TV.

Villagers had to walk for a mile or two to locate a bucket of water. So, our team located a spring some 2 miles away from San Martin. GPS helped us determine it was higher than San Martin. A gravity system of pipes pushes the water tank to San Martin, and finally to the lines to each house for water access.

Stan and Pato visited San Martin on the 19th and sat down with Antonio the chair of the village committee. First we learned that the spring went dry some two years ago. Antonio had watched Tom Benjamin do the initial project. So he merely located another site of water in the ravine, a site of an old water tank and dug a hole and reconnected the system and water continues to flow to San Martin.

Second, we evaluated the generator – solar panel system and determined that we could merely relocate the panels and perhaps secure more sun light and thus, they may not need to use the gasoline generator for electricity.

Our next stop was near Mazamitla, a site of some 500 houses for low income families. These houses will have some exciting features. Solar water heating systems on the roofs will provide warm showers. Bio-digestors at the bottom of the hill will receive all toilet waste. Methane gas will be piped to individual homes to allow families to cook meals without buying butane gas tanks or burning wood. They also have a rebate program to reward families who recycle.

Currently, electric boxes are installed. The septic lines have been laid out for all houses and come down the hill to be linked to the biodigestors. Finally federal permits will allow them to cut the trees down to move ahead with constructing houses in November.
